Use of source #1

Taking an object that has been given away is not considered theft, but copying the ideas of an anonymous author is considered plagiarism. If words and ideas were merely property, and plagiarism merely a form of theft, then there would be nothing wrong with buying the rights to authorship from another, as in the case of commercial term-paper services. But credit for authorship is not something that can be sold or given away.

What changes can you make to the paragraph above so the original source is being used ethically?

Use of source #2

Taking an object that has been abandoned or given away is not considered stealing. But copying the ideas of an anonymous creator, or claiming credit for an idea given to you by a friend who does not wish to claim credit, is considered plagiarism. If words and ideas were merely property, and plagiarism merely a form of stealing, then there would be nothing wrong with buying the rights to authorship from another, as in the case of commercial term-paper services. But credit for authorship is not something that can be sold or given away.

What changes can you make to the paragraph above so the original source is being used ethically?

Use of source #3

Plagiarism is not just another form of theft, as words and ideas are not the same as property - the credit for creating the words and ideas will always rest with the author, even if those words and ideas could be sold or given away.

What changes can you make to the paragraph above so the original source is being used ethically?

Use of source #4

There is nothing wrong with buying the rights to authorship from another, as in the case of commercial term-paper services.

What changes can you make to the paragraph above so the original source is being used ethically?
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Use of source #1</th>
<th>Type of Use</th>
</tr>
</thead>
</table>
| Taking an object that has been given away is not considered theft, but copying the ideas of an anonymous author is considered plagiarism. If words and ideas were merely property, and plagiarism merely a form of theft, then there would be nothing wrong with buying the rights to authorship from another, as in the case of commercial term-paper services. But credit for authorship is not something that can be sold or given away. | !Copyright

What changes can you make to the paragraph above so the original source is being used ethically?

Use quotation marks and cite the original source

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Use of source #2</th>
<th>Type of Use</th>
</tr>
</thead>
</table>
| Taking an object that has been abandoned or given away is not considered stealing. But copying the ideas of an anonymous creator, or claiming credit for an idea given to you by a friend who does not wish to claim credit, is considered plagiarism. If words and ideas were merely property, and plagiarism merely a form of stealing, then there would be nothing wrong with buying the rights to authorship from another, as in the case of commercial term-paper services. But credit for authorship is not something that can be sold or given away. | !Pencil

What changes can you make to the paragraph above so the original source is being used ethically?

Edit so that the wording reflects the original source, use quotation marks and cite the original source

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Use of source #3</th>
<th>Type of Use</th>
</tr>
</thead>
</table>
| Plagiarism is not just another form of theft, as words and ideas are not the same as property - the credit for creating the words and ideas will always rest with the author, even if those words and ideas could be sold or given away. | !Check

What changes can you make to the paragraph above so the original source is being used ethically?

Cite the original source

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Use of source #4</th>
<th>Type of Use</th>
</tr>
</thead>
</table>
| There is nothing wrong with buying the rights to authorship from another, as in the case of commercial term-paper services. | !Warning

What changes can you make to the paragraph above so the original source is being used ethically?

Edit to accurately reflect the meaning of the original and cite the original source